

Global Warming Mythology

Contributed by Justin Geyer, 5th grade
Friday, 04 May 2007

"Jediton, in favor of Poseidon, created the greenhouse gasses, so that Apollo's rays of warmth would be trapped in Earth's atmosphere. This started melting Hentris', the ice goddess' kingdom, causing Poseidon's kingdom to rise. To add to this effect, Jediton convinced the people of Earth to start polluting, which increased the effect ten fold. "

Once upon a time, Jediton, the Greek god of natural gasses and pollution, was sitting on the top of Mount Olympus watching Poseidon and Apollo fight over Apollo's daily habit of evaporating Poseidon's kingdom. The feud had lasted 100 years so far, and Jediton wanted it to stop. The only way to end the fighting was to join one of the god's sides, but both were Jediton's friends. Eventually Jediton decided to join Poseidon, who had been his friend much longer than Apollo.

Jediton, in favor of Poseidon, created the greenhouse gasses, so that Apollo's rays of warmth would be trapped in Earth's atmosphere. This started melting Hentris', the ice goddess' kingdom, causing Poseidon's kingdom to rise. To add to this effect, Jediton convinced the people of Earth to start polluting, which increased the effect ten fold. This angered Pan and Hentris, who though that the humans were the cause of their kingdom's downfall, and told Zeus.

Zeus, the Thunderer raged in fury. In his anger, Zeus conjured up an incredible amount of thunderstorms, tornados, and hurricanes, which increased every year, as Zeus saw how the humans started using more and more pollution, and Hentris' ice kingdom and Pan's nature kingdom continued getting smaller, while Poseidon's sea kingdom grew. In the midst of all this, humans began noticing a slow but sure change in the climate. They should not have listened to Jediton.